

Banner artwork supplied from the Free League Publishing press pack.

The Head in the Hatbox

A time-pressured Dullahan mystery for a Vaesen Society group

Content note: Blood, violence, death.

Preamble

A hatbox marked with a black star arrives at the investigators' London headquarters. When it is opened, blood drenches the staff member who lifts the lid. Inside lies a severed head: the stolen skull of a Dullahan. The delivery is deliberate. The creature will come to reclaim what is its own, while the sender uses the terror and confusion as a distraction from a larger, unknown operation.

The Black Star may be the name of an organisation, an individual, or simply the mark on the package. The investigators begin with no warning and no special preparations. They have until sunset to discover what they can and gather gold. After dark, the Dullahan may arrive at any time; midnight is the expected culmination, not a guaranteed appointment.

Prelude

This mystery begins at the investigators' base of operations. A box arrives without warning, bearing a black star. The first person to open it is drenched in blood. Inside is the Dullahan's skull.

The scenario follows the investigators as they identify the head, uncover its secret, gather gold, and decide what to do before the Dullahan arrives. The skull is both evidence and bait: it draws the creature toward them, but it is also the creature's weakness. The countdown begins with the delivery, and the investigators must research and prepare while the danger grows.

Background

Someone captured a Dullahan's skull and sent it to the Society as an act of terror or distraction. The sender expects the investigators to focus on the grisly delivery and the creature that will follow, while another part of their operation remains concealed.

The Dullahan regards its head as something of value and will pursue it. The sender's identity and larger purpose are not established here. The GM may use the Black Star as the antagonist's name, faction, or calling card. Its wider plan can remain a mystery beyond this scenario.

Conflicts

Investigation: Identify the skull, learn what is coming, and discover the secret of the Dullahan's head. Essential clues should not depend on a single successful roll; delays and failures can cost time or create complications.

Resources: Gold can repel the creature and buy time, but the investigators must find and gather it before night. Gold is a temporary defence, not a guaranteed victory.

The creature: The Dullahan is relentless and dangerous. The investigators can evade or redirect it, return the head, seize it to control the creature, or destroy it.

The hidden antagonist: The delivery confirms that the Society was deliberately targeted. It does not have to reveal the Black Star's full identity or plan.

Preparation

There is no preparation before the scenario begins. The delivery is the surprise: the investigators are at their base when the box arrives and have no advance opportunity to research, shop, or arrange special equipment.

After the skull is discovered, allow a short, urgent window to investigate and gather gold before sunset. Keep the window tight. Prolonged, safe research undermines the scenario's atmosphere.

Important People

The delivery recipient: A Society staff member or servant opens the box and is soaked in blood. They are shaken and frightened, and should be treated as a person affected by the event, not merely a source of clues.

The on-duty Society member: An optional NPC investigator can point to the Society's folklore resources, contact a specialist, or help obtain gold. Give them useful knowledge, but leave the important decisions to the player characters.

The absent sender: The Black Star is present through its mark and deliberate delivery. The GM may leave its identity unknown.

Countdown and Catastrophe

The opening catastrophe has already happened: the hatbox is opened, and blood drenches the staff member who lifts the lid. This is the shock that launches the mystery.

Advance the countdown when investigators spend significant time, expose the skull's location, or suffer a setback that delays them. Do not advance it just because they ask a question or follow a useful lead.

1. The daylight window: Research and gold-gathering are possible, but signs suggest the head is drawing attention.

2. Sunset: Daylight no longer protects them. The Dullahan may arrive at any time after dark.

3. The approach: Signs of its passage grow stronger. If the investigators have exposed or moved the skull, its route becomes clearer and its arrival draws closer.

4. Midnight: The expected culmination. If the skull remains unresolved, the Dullahan reaches the base and attacks whoever obstructs it. Death is possible, not inevitable; the investigators can still flee, divert it, use gold, or act on the head's secret.

Signs and Portents

Begin with the blood-soaked staff member and the skull in the hatbox. The skull is plainly human, but its age, condition, or expression may seem wrong. Research identifies it as belonging to a Dullahan, a headless harbinger of death that travels by night.

As the Dullahan approaches, use signs drawn from its description: distant hooves or wheels, gates and doors opening along its route, a sense of pursuit, or a glimpse of a black horse and headless rider. Staring directly at it is dangerous. Foreshadow the arrival; do not make it an unheralded attack.

Creating Atmosphere

The threat is frightening because it is supernatural and urgent. Keep the staff member's shock present; make the familiar headquarters feel exposed. Give investigators enough information to make meaningful choices, but let every delay bring the night closer. The Dullahan need not arrive immediately after sunset: uncertainty about when it will come is part of the pressure.

Location

The Society's headquarters, or the investigators' usual base, is the only fixed location. The box arrives there, the investigation begins there, and the expected midnight attack happens there if the skull remains unresolved.

The investigators choose where else to go: find gold, consult a contact, hide the skull, or draw the Dullahan away. The GM can improvise locations to support those choices.

Clues

Provide the essential facts through research, contacts, or Society records. A failed test can cost time, attract attention, or bring a complication; it should not make the mystery impossible to solve.

- What the skull is: Folklore and Society knowledge identify it as a Dullahan's head.
- What is coming: The Dullahan will seek to reclaim it. The danger begins after sunset and may culminate around midnight.
- How to hold it back: Gold repels the Dullahan. A small gold object can halt it in its path, creating an opportunity rather than a lasting defence.
- The secret: The Dullahan's head is its weakness. A mortal who seizes it can control the creature; destroying the head destroys the Dullahan.
- Who sent it: The black-star mark suggests the Society was deliberately targeted. It does not, by itself, reveal the sender's full identity or plan.

The investigators may learn these facts from the Society library, a folklore specialist, old reports, or an NPC's knowledge. Different sources can confirm or deepen the same essential clues.

Defeating the Dullahan

Defeating the creature need not mean fighting it. Gold can halt or deter it long enough to change the situation. Returning the head may end the pursuit, but releases the Dullahan. Seizing the head offers control at close quarters. Destroying it ends the creature, but the investigators must face the danger of carrying out that decision while it is coming for them.

Let the investigators decide what victory means: survival, containment, the creature's destruction, or keeping the skull from the Black Star.

Aftermath

If the head is destroyed: The Dullahan is destroyed. The Society survives, but the Black Star's reason for targeting it remains unanswered.

If the head is returned: The Dullahan reclaims it and departs. The immediate threat ends; the creature remains in the world.

If the head is seized and used to control the Dullahan: The investigators gain a dangerous advantage. What control costs, how long it lasts, and what happens to the creature are decisions for the GM and table.

If the investigators fail or flee: The Dullahan may reach the skull and leave, or attack those in its way. The head, staff, or headquarters may be lost or damaged. The Black Star's distraction has succeeded, at least temporarily, leaving its wider purpose as the investigators' next lead.